Critical Technologies Group Introduces the Washington Nationals Single-A Affiliate Hagerstown Suns to the iPhone

RICHMOND, Va. (July 10, 2010) ó Critical Technologies Group, an emerging developer of mobile applications, today announced the launch of its latest offering: the Hagerstown Suns iPhone application. The app, now available in the iTunes store, is the first free and most comprehensive mobile tool in Single-A Baseball.

“We wanted to create a new way for baseball fans of all ages to follow their favorite team,” said Critical Technologies Group CEO Scott Davis. “Whether you are on a business trip watching the live play-by-play game tracker or in the stadium and looking to supplement the scoreboard, our application will bring you closer to the game no matter where you are.”

Like never before, fans have at their fingers on-demand access to news, standings, statistics, and real-time Facebook and Twitter feeds. Fans can even view promotional schedules and purchase tickets right from their phone.

“More and more people are relying on their iPhones for more than just staying in touch,” said Suns President and General Manager Bob Flannery. “What better way to put information at the tip of our fans fingers?”

The Suns application is built with the same framework used in the successful Richmond Flying Squirrels and Lehigh Valley IronPigs applications.

About Critical Technologies Group:

Richmond-based Critical Technologies Group pioneered the convergence of fan and team in the mobile space by launching the first Minor League Baseball application to the Apple App Store. It has had three “Top 100” launches in the first half of 2010, and CTG applications are routinely featured in the “New & Noteworthy” section in iTunes.
